

An archaeological excavation near the famous Lakeshore Lodge revealed what appeared to be a seasonal fishing station dating to the Late Middle Woodland Period. Traces of maize (corn) were also found, providing evidence that limited forms of agriculture were being practiced by the groups here at that time.